Producer Prices Point to Inflation Turning Around

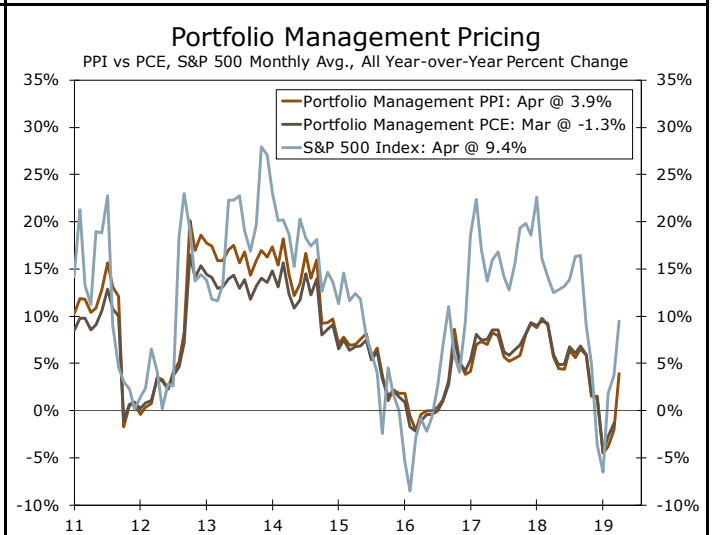

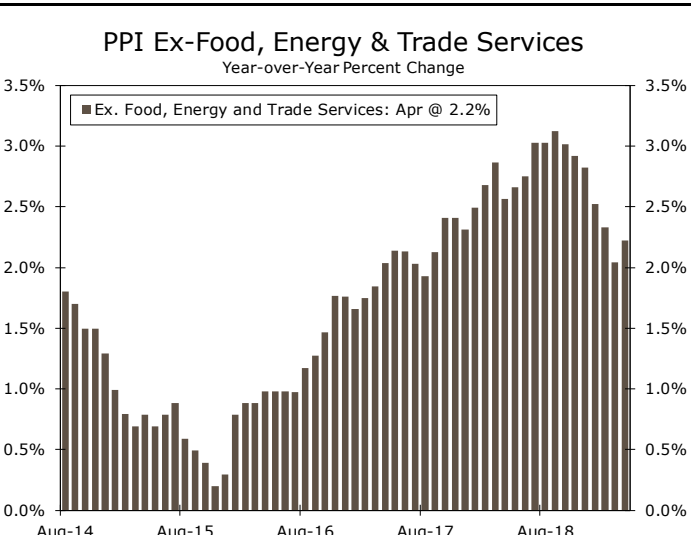

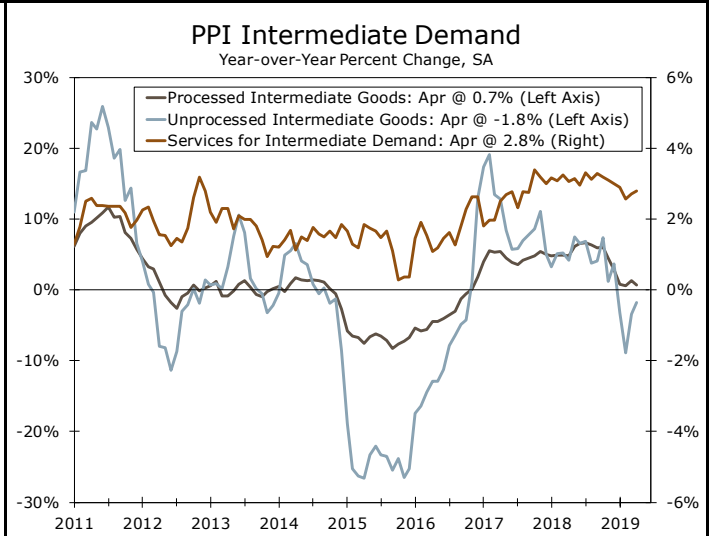

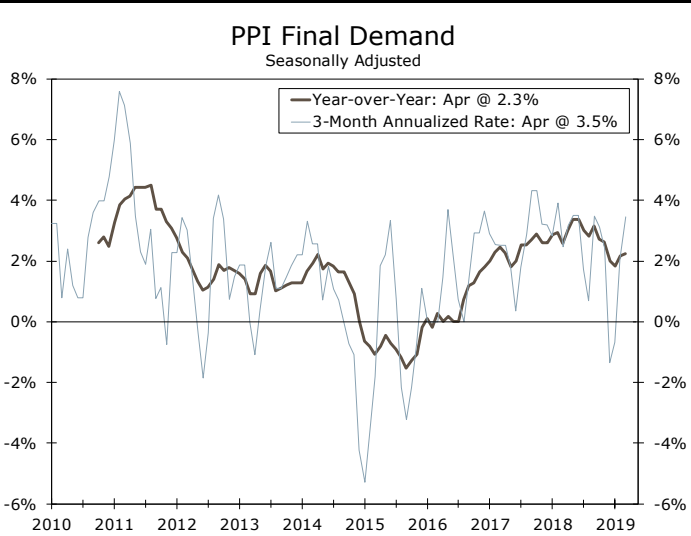

A rise in energy costs helped lift producer prices 0.2% in April, but core services prices also picked up. While the trend in inflation shows signs of turning around, price pressures remain fairly tame.

Moving Up Again

- Higher energy prices are once again pushing up inflation, but producer prices also firmed on the back of transportation and core services. The “core-core” PPI, which excludes food, energy and trade services (measured in margins), increased 0.4%.
- On a year-ago basis, both headline and the “core-core” prices rose 2.2%. Input costs for services and processed goods edged up but suggest pipeline prices remain moderate.

Support for the Fed’s Preferred Inflation Measure

- While most of the inputs for the monthly PCE deflator come from tomorrow’s CPI report, a few key inputs come from the PPI. Healthcare services prices rebounded 0.3% after declining 0.2% in March. Airline fares jumped 3.6% and are back above February levels. Meanwhile, portfolio management services, which are tied to the stock market with a lag, have fully recovered. The upshot is that the Fed’s preferred inflation gauge is set to turnaround.
